

Vipera aspis Meeting 2015

Ecology and conservation of the asp viper

Leysin (Switzerland)
25th – 27th September, 2015

The asp viper is one of the most studied snakes in Europe. But this species is particularly threatened in numerous places and different landscapes. This meeting organised by the karch would like to group the main researchers and experts working with this species and closely related ones, as well as people involved in its conservation. Consequently, this meeting will be the perfect occasion for scientists, researchers and all persons involved in the conservation of asp vipers and other European vipers to meet and exchange their experiences.

During the meeting, the first day will be dedicated to scientific works focussed on the biology, ecology and taxonomy of the species; the second day will be devoted to the conservation of the viper species, and to the presentation of action plans and specific measures. An excursion in the Alps where the asp viper is frequent will be organised for the last day.

The official languages will be French, German and English. During the conferences, it is likely that headphones with translations in another language will be provided.

Location

The meeting will take place in the Hôtel Central Résidence, route du Belvédère 20, 1854 Leysin.
